How To Create Compelling Unique Selling Propositions and Marketing Messages

www.getwsodo.com

New IC Member Joe Brown of Radio Joe's in Louisville has three questions..... 1. How can we improve our USP?...2. How many of your attendees apply what they learn?...3. How do fish think?

Joe, USP's can be built and strengthened with many different devices, notably including an extraordinary guarantee, a service advantage, a price advantage, credibility differentiation vs. competitors, hours open, added value (egs.: free music drop with every voiceover), other meaningful specifics. You can get "clues" from: what does everybody in your business do that disappoints or frustrates consumers? What can't the "big guys" do that you can? What do people tell you they want and is important to them? Also understand that some businesses lend themselves to a very concise, clear USP better than others. Still, there MUST be a reason(s) for choosing you vs. other vendors. If there aren't, really what right do you have to expect success?

NOT JUST WORDS

A lot of materials cross my desk for Critique; some are excellent; but many do not reflect the mental wrestling match over choice of each word and phrase that a pro copywriter (like me) engages in. And it's not so much a matter of greater skill, talent or even experience - it's more a matter of laziness vs. determined effort, of how seriously we each take the selection of the words we use. About that, I''m serious as onions, because what you say is less than half the battle, how you say it more than half. Don't just say it. Say it with impact. Metal-crunching, bone-jarring, adrenalin-pumping four car pile up impact.

Bette Midler's description of a bra: "the over-the-shoulder boulder holder" may never make it into a Victoria's Secret catalog, but it does create a mental picture. It is mammorable. Gary Halbert has often used "serious as cancer," but I prefer Dan Jenkins'* "serious as onions" as less of a downer. In fiction, the genre to watch for great descriptive phrases is hard-boiled detectives - "I felt like the belly of a snake after a long, dry, dusty crawl through the desert." In my Magnetic Marketing seminar, I use the example of the plumber's "Free Home Plumbing Problem Prevention Audit," and I caution audiences not to use "Free Inspection" -- which DOES sound more valuable? WOULD Tom Monaghan's USP have been even more powerful if he had said "...in 31 minutes or less" instead of the round-number of 30? These are not matters to be taken lightly.

(*Dan Jenkins is a regular contributor to Sports Illustrated, Playboy and other magazines, and a novelist. I suggest reading his books SEMI-TOUGH and DEAD SOLID PERFECT.)

If you've watched much O.J. coverage, you've seen dozens of lawyers who were NOT hired by the defense commenting on the trial. Of these, Gerry Spence, a regular O.J. commentator on The Larry King Show, is the best, most careful wordsmith. Gerry chooses his words with more care than most women give to choosing a new pair of shoes, and that's saying a lot. A Gerry Spence closing argument is worth every dollar it costs.

A well-chosen word vs. an ill-chosen word can make the difference in a headline working or failing. A collection of words, in a single sales letter, can make you rich. Can provide an "engine" for your business that will chug on profitably and reliably for years. One great ad or letter can support you in style for life. It stands to reason that it may take a bit of work to get such a thing right.

BEN & JERRY ACQUIRE MAIL-ORDER CUSTOMERS FOR FREE

You may recall the "We Need A New C.E.O." Contest run by Ben&Jerry, which was really a giant publicity stunt. I reprinted USA TODAY's article about it in a previous Issue of this Letter. (Just that "free ad" in USA TODAY was worth hundreds of thousands of dollars.) I also "entered the contest", to see what their next steps were. The Rejection 'Certificate' I received appears elsewhere in this Issue. (See page 6.) It came with coupons redeemable at stores for their products - which I did redeem, and I had never eaten a spoonful of their stuff before. But last week, the real pay-off: the new Ben&Jerry's Catalog arrived in my mailbox. They created a huge national database FREE, with publicity. It just goes to show that you CAN use PUBLICITY to directly make money.

....Some USP Ideas....

KUDOS to Joe McClure of Montrose Travel in Montrose, California; he's inventing some appealing, interesting terminology for his marketing - like "Take the AGENCY CHALLENGE!"...."Employee Vacation Discount Program"....and "The Last-Minute Club" (a registered trademark), to promote discount cruises. This kind of proprietary terminology IS important. Remember my 'plumber' story; there IS a big difference between "Free Inspection" vs. "Free Home Plumbing Problem Prevention Audit."

Also - C-21 Agent, Ernie Gonzaga, Arcadia, California, has put together a good "Service Package Description." For example her #2: I will only show you homes that fit your financial position, and your needs and desires. I will not waste your time on properties you can't afford or would not be interested in....her #3: If the area you want to move in is unknown to me, I will refer you to the top agents in that area. In total, Ernie has a 6-Point 'package' for buyers, and 8-Point for sellers. REMEMBER: a "Service Package Description" should be an expansion of your USP, telling me why I should choose to do business with YOU.

M&M Fishing Tours of Seattle, Washington says: "We guarantee you catch fish or you fish for free." There's a specific guarantee. More marketers should have the kind of guts to make such guarantees. (But, their name's bad. M&M - so what? Why not: Guaranteed Fishing Tours, Inc.) By the way, their business naturally lends itself to a "Video Brochure," which I urged them to consider.

THE FAILURE OF THE "INSTITUTIONAL" LETTER

Here's a fantastic example of what not to do and how not to do it: a letter I received from International Computing Systems, Inc. in Mesa, Arizona. First, it's personalized, but "Kennedy" is misspelled. Then, here's how it begins: "It gives me great pleasure to introduce our company and to announce our services...." Well, ain't that terrific - he's having "great pleasure,"

www.getwsodo.com

but what am I getting? Eyestrain reading about his orgasm. Do I care whether anything gives this guy great pleasure? Absolutely not. When I got up this morning, I didn't say: "I sure hope that guy over at International Computing Systems had great pleasure yesterday and sends me a letter about it today. That'll be the highlight of my morning!"

Next he says: "ICS is a Phoenix-based corporation..." Well, it isn't. It's in Mesa. But I can figure all that out for myself. The address is on the letterhead. I hope these guys are smarter than this indicates. If they don't know where they are, how are they going to help me?

Now he finally gets around to talking about what I might get...which he provides as the following list of services. "Our services include: high volume forms keying, critical field formatting, relational field edits, field verification and a choice of output medium." Oh boy. First of all, I don't know what any of that means. Second of all, I do not ever want to know. Third, even if I did know, it's a list of boring features - not a benefit to be had.

He ends with "We look forward to showing you the various ways ICS can serve your company." That's nice. Permit me a very crass, chauvinist joke I'll clean up here: Donald Trump's in an elevator...in comes a drop-dead gorgeous young lady...door closes...she says: "You're Donald Trump, right?"..."Yes, I am," he says..."we're alone," she says, "So I could strip off all my clothes and make mad, passionate love to you right here and now." Trump thinks for a minute, then asks "Yes, but what's in it for me?"

You see, this sales letter fails miserably on ALL important counts. It's institutional stuff; 'we' not 'you' oriented; even downright pompous...it never states a benefit or makes a promise...it talks only in features...it indulges in jargon...it offers no widget, incentive or urgency for reply. Pitiful.

Why Big Co's Screw Up Their Direct Marketing: Another Example

Ford Motor Co. completed a 2-million piece direct-mail campaign driving customers to dealerships for test drives, with the lure of a $50 Savings Bond, and they managed to get a 5% response rate, which they are thrilled with. Ford paid a mill for the "creative" and the mailing, but the dealers had to ante up the bonds. 40% of their dealers refused to participate! These dealers were/are too damned stupid to compare the cost of this qualified lead against what they typically waste in local newspaper and TV ads to get a body in the door. Then, of the 60% who did play along, you can bet your uncle's false teeth that most treated the whole thing as a costly nuisance, didn't control these leads, didn't enroll the salespeple in the process, and so on. Well, let's think here: one, a more exciting incentive than a Savings Bond could have been found, that cost the dealers a lot less; then, Ford could have better sold the dealers AND their salespeople on participation; two, with a strong giveaway in exchange for a test drive, aimed at drivers of comparable cars, if you can't do better than 5%, you oughta find another career. Given the same dough, I'd pull 15%+. Third, with outbound telephone support behind the mailing, they could have gotten another 15%. With from-the-dealer subsequent mailings, another 5%.

HOW TO MAKE YOUR AD, SALES LETTER, ETC. COPY SIZZLE LIKE THE PHOENIX SUMMER HEAT!

You're next going to read my little article with the "shocking" headline, followed immediately by an article by Jeff Paul, reprinted from Dartnell's Sales & Marketing Executive Report. (Dartnell, 4600 N. Ravenswood Ave., Chicago, IL 60640, 800/621-5463.) As you undoubtedly know, Jeff started as a 'student' of mine and has rapidly become a top-flight direct response copywriter...so good that Dartnell's picked him as a columnist. (I wasn't invited.) Pay close attention to this pair of articles and you'll be able to make your printed matter work much, much better.

ROCK STAR GENITALIA PRESERVED IN PLASTER FOR POSTERITY

On the front page of the Toronto Globe and Mail, Toronto's newspaper, April 23rd, here's the headline: TRIAL FEATURES CASTS OF 25 - ROCK STAR GENITALIA MOLDED IN PLASTER. All right, I dare ya not to read that article.

Here goes - I quote, dateline Los Angeles (where else?): Cynthia Plaster Caster sits at a wooden table while two lawyers argue about who really owns what she calls her babies - a collection of moldings of the genitalia of some of the most famous male rock stars of the 1960's. She is at the center of a million dollar lawsuit....Ms. Plaster Caster pioneered her novel art form two decades ago when the world was a little more innocent, if that's the word to describe the antics of a woman who approached musicians and.....

WHEN THE TEACHER SUGGESTED WE GO OUT AND MAKE A CAST OF SOMETHING HARD....

She was an art student ....'When the teacher suggested we go out and make a plaster cast of something hard, I knew exactly what I wanted to do,' she said. So she scooped up a bag of plaster compound, drafted a girlfriend as an assistant and made a beeline for the band Paul Revere And The Raiders.

She delegated the job of arousing her subjects.....

WHAT'S ANTHONY NEWLEY DOING IN THIS GROUP?

To cut this very lengthy article short, she gave her 25 casts to someone for safekeeping and wants them back, he claims he paid for them, so off to court everybody goes, to fight over the anatomically accurate statues of Jimi Hendrix and, of all people, Anthony Newley, and 23 more, of their privates. (By the way, bronze copies of these casts were made in 1971 and are on exhibit in a museum somewhere.)

Why on earth have I written about this in my newsletter? Well, first of all, I'm fascinated with this finding its way onto the front page of a major metropolitan newspaper. But that's really neither here or there, unless you're interested in how to sell a lot of newspapers at the water cooler. If LA LAW doesn't snap this up, I give up. But now here's the point: this captured my attention, interest, curiosity and imagination, and here, it did the same to you, and will to anybody you show it to or tell about it...and the reasons why it has that kind of power over us are very, very important to understand and use.

Here's what's at work:

1. A story
2. Drama
3. Humor
4. Sex
5. Words that create Pictures
6. Celebrities

The order's not important. The 6 items are. If you want to COMMAND interest, this is a proven, powerful formula for doing so.

I know, I know, YOUR clientele is too sophisticated, too educated, too religious, too this or that to be dealt with this way. They are, huh. If you cling to that egotistical foolishness, you might as well join The Flat Earth Society too.

Jeff Paul has come to grips with this like no one else I've ever worked with. He sells to Certified Financial Planners. And insurance professionals. Roll "Certified Financial Planner" around on your tongue a few times -- sounds pretty sophisticated, doesn't it? This HAS to be a bunch that knows what wine to order and how to eat gapacho with smiles on their faces. Well, take a close look at the advertising and direct-mail that has made Jeff an almost-overnight, bonafide, CASH MILLIONAIRE selling to this market, and you tell me how sophisticated it is. What is the #1 Marketing Sin? Don't make it!

Which brings us to why so many sales letters miss the mark. What makes you think, just because you write a letter, that anybody's required to read it? This is like the idea of answering the phone. Guy says to me: "I know you were there - why didn't you answer the phone?" Because I didn't want to, that's why. Where's the law that says just because you want to talk to me, I have to respond? People are all screwed up over this stuff. So, you send out

this dull, dry, boring letter and then wonder why you got poor response. Did it ever occur to you that nobody CHOSE to read it?

The flip side - what do people, ALL people, want more than anything else? Think about this carefully.

Here's a hint: a top baseball player makes $15,000 a game, a school teacher, $15,000 a year. Johnny Carson - millions and millions and millions. Roseanne Barr - millions more. An air traffic controller, maybe $50,000. Who makes more money: a heart surgeon or Madonna? Who makes more money: Tom Brokaw or Sylvester Stallone?

Here's another hint: the other night, on some news show, they were showing the insides of an inner city ghetto apartment. Tragically, a welfare mother with four kids lived in this little efficiency. There were holes in the walls, a broken out window. Bugs. Rats. Filth. And a shiny 45-inch color TV.

Get this and get it straight: people want to be ENTERTAINED.

Now,. in direct marketing, there IS a line. We do not want to be cute or funny for the sake of being cute or funny, anymore than we want to join the traditional advertising folks in being creative for the sake of being creative. We're not stand-up comics, we're salespeople But we DO want to be entertaining in a way that facillitates deliver of the sales message. Lighten up.

WHY COMPANIES DON'T SELL AS MUCH AS THEY SHOULD

By: Jeffrey Paul, CFP

A lot of business executives don't like what I have to say. As a matter of fact, I often get accused of being somewhat of a renegade, or a "boat rocker." You see, I am firmly convinced that there are lots of businesses, in all kinds of industries, that could be making a heck of a lot more money. They could enrich themselves, their salespeople, and there stockholders, if they understood one basic concept.

Yet, I'm just as firmly convinced that most will never get to the heights they could because they will not let this "missing ingredient" enter into their lives. What am I talking about here? It is as ingrained in all of us as life itself. It's called human emotion.

You see, most executives, and what I call "home office types," have zero clue about the importance of getting human emotions into their marketing. And, because they don't have emotions in their prospecting, their marketing is mostly ineffective. And, if their marketing is not working well, the whole company suffers. Because, without a doubt, there is nothing more important than marketing. Without "killer" marketing, there will not be a killer business. Period.

OK. So, what is this "human emotion" stuff, and why is it missing? Well, lets first talk about the emotions we all have, and how they drive us.

You see, a concept that is totally lost on most executives is that every decision we make in life is based on emotion. And we rationalize those emotionally-based decisions, later. Logically. After the fact!

Somehow, American businesses believe the backward, and totally incorrect, notion that people make decisions from a rational, logical viewpoint. And then feel good about it emotionally, after the decision. Wrong, wrong, wrong! No one, and I mean no one, makes decisions from logic.

You see, our emotions are so ingrained in our subconscious minds, that we cannot separate them from our so-called conscious (or outward) mind. It is impossible to think about anything without having a subconscious, emotional stream of feelings enter into our conscious thoughts and reactions. And these emotions will be the driving force when a decision is being made. Particularly, decisions to respond to some marketing offer or another.

We'll only respond to advertising, letters, phone calls, and the like that hit an emotional hot button! If the attempt at getting a prospect interested in what you have to offer is based on some boring, dry, "professional," logical appeal, it is doomed to fail.

Let me share a quick example with you to illustrate this point.

A subscriber of mine recently called me during a break in a national sales conference, put on by his home office. He couldn't wait to call me, because he thought I'd get a kick out of this story.

The company spent two days indoctrinating the sales force on its new "variable life insurance" products. The home office boys were pounding into the sales troops' heads that out of 41 available policies in the marketplace, theirs was the best.

"It really is the best," said the men in the suits. "And, since it is really the best, we don't want to hear any tales of woe from you salespeople. All you've got to do is go out and talk to enough people and you will sell tons of this stuff, because it is so good!

"Therefore, we don't want to hear any subversive ideas about all this time-wasting stuff, like 'relationship building,' and 'needs selling.' We've got the best product, and people will be compelled to buy it straight out. So go out, market this product, and sell, sell, sell!"

Now, let me ask you something. Have you ever heard a pitch like this before? I mean, come on, give me a break!

These executives are so out of touch with reality, it is beyond anything I can imagine. They live in some fairyland of make-believe and pixie dust. Time for a reality check, people!

What they don't have a clue about is that:

1. Even the best salesperson in the world, with the best product or service in the world, will starve without interested prospects to talk to every day! If this product is really that good, selling it is impossible, if the salespeople are mostly talking to their TVs and the dog.

2. Since the company thinks the "goodness" of the product is enough to use as a marketing approach, and it is forcing its salespeople to market from this selfish viewpoint, ther will be few sales because there will be few prospects.

3. Unless the geniuses at the home offices wake up and realize the public could not care less about how great they are, and teach the agents to use emotions to get people intersted, they will have some bad sales figures to share with their stockholders.

Wouldn't it be better if this company encouraged the sales force to use the emotions of empathy, concern, and compassion to generate interested prospects?

Wouldn't it be better for the agents to spend time understanding what the prospects really want from an emotional standpoint?

You see, everyone makes these emotional decisions to respond to marketing, if the message gets them curious, if it makes them wonder if the thing being marketed will get them what they want. What they want emotionally. (Not what they need. No. Just what they want. I'll discuss this issue in more detail in a future article.)

We all have the same basic emotional wants:

To prevent the loss of something; Power; Comfort; To look good; Approval; Recognition; Status; Pleasure. And on and on and on.

Notice that these wants are based on emotions, not logic? Notice that it will take a human, down-to-earth approach to get through to someone and hit these emotions?

A marketing slogan like, "Measuring Success One Investor At A Time," or, "For The Company You Keep," just doesn't get it. Almost all businesses use these same unemotional, boring ways of supposedly getting people interested. And almost always, they fail to do the job, and wonder why. (Or, in many cases, they don't even know they are wasting all their money, because they are so blind to communicating what the potential customers want. They actually think that what the home office wants is what the prospects want! What a mistake!)

By the way, I know what you're thinking. You're thinking, "OK, Jeff. Maybe, and I'm just saying maybe, this emotional stuff works on consumer marketing. But it will never work in a business-to-business situation. My business customers are far too sophisticated to fall for this human-emotion stuff."

Well, I don't know if I can tell you how wrong you are in this short space, but I'll try. Every businessperson is first, a person, not a computer-like drone, with no emotions. yes, a person. With all the same fears, goals, desires, or wants; like we all have. And all businesspeople will respond to marketing, if it hits their particular business wants. (And/or their personal, nonbusiness wants!)

This final point really brings home my message. Business-people are nothing more, or nothing less, than plain old people. People who love their kids. People who fight with their spouses. People who watch basketball and go shopping. People who laugh and cry. Just like me. And just like you.

Another quick example. A firm selling some high-tech widget sent out a package to purchasing engineers containing an autographed baseball. The accompanying letter said that if they wanted another auto-graphed ball to send in the reply card. It went on to say something like, "If you'd like to see another star on a ball, you'll probably like to hear about our new 'star' on a computer!"

Sounds pretty hokey, huh? Very unprofessional, right? Well, I don't know. The guy who thought this up said he had over an 80% response rate and sold millions of dollars of this high-tech gizmo because of it!

Now, aren't these "egg head" engineer-purchasing executives "too sophisticated" for such a lowbrow marketing technique? Aren't they only interested in the specs, and performance ratings, and so forth?

Or are they just like everyone else, and want a free, autographed baseball? (By the way, I never advocate anything unethical, or sleazy, or whatever. You can be down-to-earth without being obnoxious.)

So, promise me you'll lose your preconceived notion that marketing to "sophisticated" businesspeople is anything more than finding the right emotional buttons. OK? Do we have a deal?

To sum up: If you want your business to succeed in these tough times, you'd better start a mission of:

1. Finding out the emotions that will stir your prospects' hot buttons;

2. Telling them you can give them what they want;

3. Figuring out how to handle all the extra business.

In all my years in using direct response emotional marketing, things have never been better! This crazy economy has created the absolute best marketing environment I've ever lived through. Anyone who is listening to what I teach is getting more leads and more sales than ever before! Many of my subscribers and clients are having the best years in their history! Just at the time when everyone else is complaining and moaning about how "bad it is out there."

Yes, it's very bad if you're trying the same old tired, useless, and unemotional marketing methods.

And, yes, times are the best for those of us who will come down from our high horses and get down to earth and become one with customer emotions!

TIPS FOR RADIO SPOTS

I frankly, am not a big fan of radio advertising - but, if you are going to use it, here are the keys to its effectiveness:

* A first sentence that grabs the reader and demands attention, preferably by leading with a benefit.

* Make it easy to understand.

* If selling a product, you must have a clear, simple guarantee.

www.getwsodo.com

* Make your address and/or phone number easy to remember and repeat it often.

* Use a 'voice' that is compelling. Having a popular radio personality deliver your commercial, if possible in a loose, conversational way, often works best.

* Be straightforward (not clever or funny).

* Ask for direct response, even for a small, local business. Offer a booklet, coupons, something to get calls. This makes radio ads' results measurable and accountable.

* Saturate!

Example: WHY NOT DINE IN ITALY TONIGHT? Giorgio's Italian Grotto is so authentic you'll feel like sending a postcard home! Homemade pasta, fresh seafood, great atmosphere, and affordable prices. CALL 123-4567 and we'll send you a mini-menu and a 2-for-1 dinner coupon FREE. Giorgio's is THE place to go for the PERFECT dining experience. Call 123-4567 now, for your FREE 2-for-1 Coupon. Giorgio's is conveniently located at 7th and Bell, with plenty of parking. For a mini-menu and a 2-for-1 coupon, FREE, call 123-4567. 123-4567, call today!

(Please note THE OFFER being made here. Few advertisers using radio, TV or other media understand the importance of making a Direct-Response offer. This makes this advertising measurable - accurately measurable. It provides a list, for followup marketing.)

2 One of the best ways to use a saturation radio campaign: to advertise a newspaper ad. You might use radio all week long to direct attention to your big newspaper ad in the Friday and Sunday newspapers.

Here's one quick Copywriting Clinic Tip:

Dashiell Hammet, the famous mystery writer, once gave other writers this advice:

WHEN IN DOUBT,
HAVE SOMEONE COME CRASHING
THROUGH THE DOOR WITH A GUN.

His advice reflects the smart copywriter's paranoid concern over losing the attention of the reader. Which brings me to my Ultimate Marketing Sin: BEING BORING. Writing a strong ad or sales letter and writing a book have this in common; readers will forgive a lot, but they will not tolerate being bored.

The Price Resistance Eliminator: Always Compare Apples To Oranges!

"You can't compare apples to oranges." I'm sure you've heard that; I encourage you to get it completely out of your mind! The secret strategy for eliminating price resistance is to compare apples to oranges!

Let me give you an exact example:

In the seminars that I give for SuccessTrak, Inc., I sell a 12-month "trak" (subscription) of audio cassettes on practice promotion and success subjects. Counting the bonus items, there are 18 cassettes in the one year program - sold for $399. Today, many audio cassette albums, available on a variety of topics sell for an average of $10 a tape, i.e. $60 for a six cassette album. On that basis, these 18 cassettes would sell for only $180. The economics of marketing via free seminars requires that we sell for the considerably higher price. Also, due to the specialized, valuable nature of the information in these cassettes, we feel justified in commanding the higher price. But how do you clearly and successfully justify that price to the consumer? Obviously, if you compare other cassette products to these cassette products (apples to apples), you're dead.

In this case, we compare cassettes to seminars. If the Doctor obtained the same basic information that is in the cassettes by attending the seminars on which the cassettes are based, he would have spent over $780 on enrollment fees alone, not to mention time away from his practice during the week or family on weekends, travel and lodging costs and other expenses. All things considered, he's saving much more than $300.

By switching to an apples-to-oranges comparison, I present a compelling argument of savings to the consumer.

Price Resistance

If you try and deal with price resistance by arguing in favor of your higher quality, your better service, etc., you will find your sales work difficult most of the time. People do want superior quality goods and services, but they still don't enjoy paying premium prices for them. Many marketers fight that battle unnecessarily.

It is much easier and much more effective to switch the standards of comparison, win by comparing apples-to-oranges and then "throw in" the superior quality at "no extra cost."

If you are in a selling situation where there is heads on competition, even competitive bidding, this technique can still be used. Recently I was consulting with a manufacturing company in direct competitive bid warfare with a lower price opponent. They were losing bid after bid. I said: "Something has to change here." They said: "It can't. We can't cut our prices any lower." I said: "If we can't come in with the lower bid, we might as well come in with an even higher bid - but let's change the rules of the game when we do it."

I analyzed their operations and discovered that they were in a position to include warehousing and fulfillment at a much lower cost than their competitor could possibly include it. By adding that to their specifications, their higher quote now becomes the more attractive quote.

Don't Compete Head On

Many big companies have learned this lesson, although they don't capitalize on it to the extent they could. In traveling, for example, I prefer to stay in an Embassy Suites hotel if available. They have two-room suites, free cocktails, and free, full breakfast "built into" their room rates. In reality, their suites aren't much bigger than a full size hotel room; they've just creatively apportioned and partitioned the space. By changing the standards of comparison, though, they have a product that is much more attractive to many people than their competitors. They have created a suite vs. room at the same price comparison.

www.getwsodo.com

There are many different ways to change the rules of the game and utilize apples-to-oranges comparisons. I urge you to look for ways appropriate to your selling activities. This is the price resistance eliminator!
